Copyright

and the Access Copyright licence

You have work to do and you need information to do it. Between your school's photocopying licence, the public domain and fair dealing, you have access to a world of information you need to get that work done.

How does copyright work?

Copyright law protects creative works such as books, sound or video recordings, art works, photographs and other printed or digital material. Generally, under Canadian copyright law, the copyright owner of a work has the sole right to produce, reproduce or alter that work, which means that people who want to use the work in some way may need to get permission first.

The photocopying licence your school has with Access Copyright gives you advance permission to photocopy works where the use is not fair dealing, or they are not in the public domain. With the licence you are free to copy excerpts from print materials, like the books and journals in your school's library. Your school pays an annual fee to cover this copying and these fees are passed on to copyright owners so that they get paid for their work when it is copied instead of purchased.

The Access Copyright licence allows you to copy up to 10% of a published work or the following, whichever is greater:

- an entire chapter, provided it is not more than 20% of a book
- an entire newspaper article or page
- an entire single short story, play, poem, essay or article from a book or periodical issue containing other works
- an entire entry from an encyclopedia, dictionary or similar reference book
- an entire reproduction of an artistic work from a book or periodical issue containing other works

The Access Copyright licence does not permit you to copy an entire textbook, nor does it permit the resale of any copies you make.

Other ways you have permission

Fair Dealing

The Access Copyright photocopying licence complements what the Canadian Copyright Act allows you to copy under fair dealing. Fair dealing allows some copying in certain circumstances, including private study, review or criticism.

You can get more information about fair dealing from your school's librarian or by visiting the Canadian Intellectual Property Office's (CIPO) website at www.cipo.gc.ca.

The Public Domain

The Canadian Copyright Act enables creators to earn a living from their work by protecting it for a term that is generally measured by the life of the creator plus 50 years. If the creator or creators of a work have been dead for more than 50 years, the copyright in their works expire, and you are free to copy the works. You can use works that are in the public domain in limitless ways, including cultural, educational, personal and social purposes.

You can get more information about the public domain from CIPO or the Project Gutenberg website at www.gutenberg.org.

The Creative Commons

The Creative Commons is a relatively new system that allows copyright owners to provide users with varying degrees of access to their works. The author of a book, for example, can put that book online under a Creative Commons licence that allows users to copy all or part of the book, even for commercial purposes. There is a constantly growing body of useful works online that you can find by using the search feature on the Creative Commons website, or through various search engines – for example, by using Google's advanced search feature.

You can find out more about the Creative Commons at www.creativecommons.org.

Open Access Journals

The online Directory of Open Access Journals provides users with a searchable database of scientific and scholarly journals that allow users to "read, download, copy, distribute, print, search, or link to the full texts" of the articles they contain. Through this directory, you have access to a range of research to help you in your courses.

You can find out more by asking a librarian or visiting www.doaj.org.
